

Disclosure Statement

By Timothy J. Bartik, for “Using Place-Based Jobs Policies to Help Distressed Communities”.

The research for this article was not supported by any outside funding. No one had the right to review the article before publication.

In the past three years, I have received financial support for some of my other research on economic development policies from The Pew Charitable Trusts. Any views expressed in this article are my own and do not necessarily reflect the views of The Pew Charitable Trusts. Some of Pew’s support for my research has in turn been funded by The Laura and John Arnold Foundation. I have also done research funded by the Michigan Economic Development Corporation to evaluate one of the state’s incentive programs. I have received funding from the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities for research on how to help manufacturing-intensive communities. I have also received funding from the Brookings Institution for a policy brief on how to help distressed communities. I am currently part of a project funded by the Kellogg Foundation that includes an evaluation of economic development policies in the Battle Creek area. In addition, I am about to begin research on a project on identifying successful local economies that is funded by the Smith Richardson Foundation.
